*1: Other temporary housing includes public housing, public servant housing, and UR(Urben Renaissance Agency) rental housing.

*2: “Number of provided units (houses)” is the number of existing container-type temporary housing units, excluding the number of units dismantled after the implementation of disaster prevention group relocation promotion projects, etc., from the number of maintained units (22,095 houses).

Emergency temporary housing is as follows:

- Housing provided by the prefecture based on the Disaster Relief Act to secure housing for households affected by the Great East Japan Earthquake, where houses were completely destroyed, completely burned down, or washed away, and where the resident does not have a home in which to reside.
- The Disaster Relief Act envisioned constructing emergency temporary housing (container-type temporary housing), but owing to the massive and extensive damage of the Great East Japan Earthquake and the loss of homes by many residents, the implementing local government that is the prefecture provided “apartment-type rental housing,” where private rental properties were rented, as emergency temporary housing equivalent to container-type temporary housing. Other existing housing resources, such as public housing, were treated in the same way and effectively utilized.
